Sophos' report comes days after a user at a tech conference claimed that he was asked to deliver an e-mail containing the latest virus variant to a bank. Original story: The Locky gang has reportedly stolen an "astronomical" amount of online banking credentials — at least 2.9 million, based on a report from security firm Sophos. At a moment when institutions are pulling in new customers from emerging markets, the gang has reportedly targeted "not only high-profile financial institutions in highly advanced economies, but more mundane ones in developing countries," Sophos said Monday. In addition to stealing credentials, it has forced its targets to shut down and open fake pages, which redirect users to websites that look legitimate but where malware is waiting to infect them. The Locky gang has been tracking around 4.8 million organizations for months, the firm said, and is responsible for the largest single outbreak of malware in years. Locky recently infected 1,100 organizations in a 24-hour period on Friday, a period that coincided with a major U.S. credit card security breach, Sophos said. "It has been in use for almost six months, and is the biggest malware outbreak since the first Conficker worm emerged in 2007," the firm said. The Locky gang has been using the same approach as other crimeware groups. "The Locky gang have invested heavily in getting in ahead of organizations' defenses," Sophos said. "They use a sophisticated social engineering approach to trick the victim into clicking a link or opening an attachment." On Friday, for instance, the gang sent an e-mail to a user at an unnamed company in Japan. "I would like to know how many employees can log in and out of your

That's something an upgraded unit of the Russian-made BMP2M40V4 (mounted by the vehicle pictured above) managed to accomplish when we featured the unit in a previous article. The BMP2M40V4 is based on the BMP2 which as we have already reported is a robust vehicle that combines the effective cross-country mobility of a tracked vehicle with the protection of a fully protected troop-carrier. The BMP2M40V4 can carry 8 fully equipped BTR-D (8×2 in the three-meter version and 12×2 in the five-meter version) and has the same frontal protection as the BMP2. The vehicle employs the same system as the BMP2M30V4 which we featured in a previous article. That is to say that all vehicle's elements are produced in a weld 3ef4e8ef8d
