The unit has been in operational mode in Wisconsin since July 2013, according to the U.S. Marine Corps. Nancy Pennington, manager of the UW Animal Care Facility, said the center is designed to perform up to three operations at once. "They could do the surgery, deliver the baby and resuscitate it," she said. "They're three steps in one." It is the latest of a series of advancements for the department, which has produced a hand-held animal operator that has been used on swine, sheep, goats, cows and a dog. The tool is a large rubber glove with a flexible arm on the back end, complete with a medical-style defibrillator and several pens for animals to be placed inside. The innovation, which includes an array of small cameras on the glove, a standard defibrillator and a heat lamp, gives veterinarians and technicians a way to examine animals without subjecting them to anesthesia. The unit is more portable than the previous equipment, which required the anesthesia, said Sgt. Joseph Jones, an animal technician at the UW Animal Care Facility. The device is also more efficient, Jones said. "It's like magic," Jones said. "You see it and you go, 'Ah, that's why.' It's just so
