(NY Times Book Review), J. An analysis of 9,799,214 variants discovered by The Cancer Genome Atlas identifies frequently mutated genes across all genomic features and in all cancer types. The Cancer Genome Atlas (TCGA) Consortium published the preliminary finding of a comprehensive landscape of somatic genomic variants in all major cancer types, but owing to large sample sizes the data only applied to the coding regions. We comprehensively analyzed the TCGA data and found that the mutation landscape was conserved across genes, cancer types, and genomic features. A small fraction of the mutations were in exonic splice enhancers and silencers, a fraction in the 3'- and 5'- untranslated regions was due to reads that straddled the exon-intron junctions, and the majority were missense mutations in or near the coding regions. The cancer types with the most frequently mutated gene had the most frequently altered pathways and functional features. These results indicate that the analysis of germline genome-wide sequencing for cancer families should include somatic mutations with functional context. To identify the problems contributing to non-adherence to discharge medications in a university hospital in Oman, and to evaluate the effectiveness of an intervention. The secondary objectives were to measure improvement in patient knowledge and adherence over the study period, and to identify factors that affect adherence to discharge medications. The study was conducted as a single-centre before and after interventional study. All participants were patients who visited the emergency department (ED) from February to July 2017, and discharged medications were checked for adherence upon discharge. The discharge medications from the patients who visited the ED during the study period were checked to measure medication adherence for a 12-month period. The patients' demographics were examined and analysed to identify the factors that affect medication adherence. The compliance to discharge medications improved from 85.9% to 95% after the intervention (p = 0.01). Awareness of the discharge medications improved over time as the majority (86%) of the patients learned about their medications at discharge. The most common reasons for non-adherence were forgetfulness (44.9%) and lack of follow-up instructions (48.6%). The adherence rate to discharge medications was 93% on the last day of the study. Compliance to discharge medications improved significantly in this study. Implementing a discharge medication programme that incorporates patient education, communication and follow-up could further enhance adherence to medications. Future studies are needed to determine the effects of a discharge medication programme on patient outcomes. Vegetables and fruit in Riyadh.
