Having the ability to perform an instant website speed test without having to wait until later is awesome! .The 'categories' list (its primary purpose), is fed with information from the database, and provides an array of default categories based on your profile, which will be used to help categorize your comments. You can filter and display the categories, as well as edit the list of categories. This is accomplished with a form, which is available by clicking on the 'categories' link. The form uses ajax to update the 'categories' list without a page refresh, and uses a table to display the 'categories', which is also updated with ajax, so the whole process occurs in the background. The default list of categories used is based on your profile and shown below. We think that this list is relatively good, but certainly not final.

If you have suggestions for additional categories, please send them in.

Evaluation of the excretory system of human urothelial cancer cells using fluid flow. Malignant bladder cancer is an important cause of morbidity and mortality. Rapid, noninvasive assessment of urothelial cell biology would enable early and individualized therapy to be implemented. In this study, the feasibility of utilizing flow cytometry as a noninvasive method for assessing human bladder urothelial cell health is investigated. Using the human 5637 cell line, cells were first exposed to fluid flow for 48 hr, and then subjected to flow cytometry analysis. The integrity of the membrane was assessed using flow cytometry analysis of three lipid-specific dyes. In addition, the permeability and integrity of the membrane were further evaluated by monitoring the binding of a lactate dehydrogenase dye, and a dyes that specifically bind the actin cytoskeleton and the chromatin. Finally, flow cytometry was used to determine the cell surface binding of a urothelial cell-specific antibody. Results suggest that noninvasive flow cytometry is a rapid method for assessment of urothelial cell membrane integrity.
