Twenty Salmonella strains isolated from cattle and swine feces in the states of Mato Grosso, Paraná, Minas Gerais, Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo were tested for their genotype and phenotypic markers. Using the Shigella-Salmonella Group specific method, we identified ten of the twenty strains as Salmonella bongori, eight as Salmonella enterica serotype Livanhi, and two as Salmonella enterica serotype Livingstone. One of the twenty strains was identified as Salmonella enterica serotype Kingston. All Salmonella bongori strains and five of the eight Salmonella Livanhi strains were resistant to ampicillin, erythromycin, gentamycin, streptomycin and tetracycline. Only two Salmonella Livanhi strains were resistant to sulfamethoxazole and trimethoprim. Five of the six S. Livanhi strains isolated from swine feces and five of the eight Salmonella bongori strains isolated from cattle feces were characterized by using the glucose fermentation test and the H-phage test, which are specific for S. enterica serotype Livanhi. The Salmonella Livanhi strains were further characterized by using the motility test, lysine decarboxylation test, indole production test, and auE test, which are specific for Salmonella enterica serotype Livingstone. We conclude that Salmonella bongori and S. Livanhi strains isolated from cattle feces and swine feces were members of the same genetic line.
