Quality of life and HIV-related stigma as predictors of adherence to antiretroviral therapy among HIV-positive patients in Lithuania. High levels of nonadherence to antiretroviral therapy are among the most important determinants of progression of acquired immunodeficiency syndrome. This study examined the relationship between quality of life, psychological distress and stigma and antiretroviral therapy adherence among HIV-positive patients in Lithuania. The study participants consisted of 240 people, including 132 men and 108 women, with a mean age of 47 years. Participants completed the reliable and validated Transactional Model of Stigma Scale, the Medical Outcomes Study HIV Health Survey, the HIV-related quality of life instrument, and the HIV Adherence Questionnaire. The results showed that internalized stigma was the strongest predictor of adherence behavior; only stigma that was internalized was a significant predictor of adherence. Neither quality of life nor psychological distress were significant predictors of adherence. Effective interventions to improve antiretroviral therapy adherence are urgently needed in the context of the human immunodeficiency virus epidemic in Lithuania. In the United States, a number of "herbal ecstasy" products sold as dietary supplements are currently marketed in state and at times in nationwide chains as well. To date, scientific studies have not confirmed their efficacy or safety. In addition, some herbal ecstasy products contain potentially toxic ingredients. A new study, published in the July 1 issue of Clinical Toxicology, evaluated the use of a combination of Chinese herbal preparations to reverse the toxic effects of ethanol in liver disease. Cases of severe acute alcoholic hepatitis are difficult to manage and carry a high mortality. Many patients need intensive care and in the worst case, liver transplantation. The chance of surviving the illness is better if treatment is started early and combined with supportive measures. Experts recommend abstinence from alcohol to reduce the chance of other, potentially fatal, liver diseases developing. Conventional treatment of alcoholic hepatitis consists of treating the underlying liver disease (alcoholic hepatitis), supportive care
