There are also some information about performance issues with the EventSourcedProjectionStrategy (described in the prior blog post) based on a benchmark with pure JMS in WildFly. When and how to use WildFly? If you do some research on WildFly, you will probably find that it is advertised to be a scalable and robust application server for Java EE (or even JSF). And it is indeed an improvement over the old Java EE 6 Web Profile, which is quite limited. For example, there is no support for EJB 3.2 or for bean shell. The new project type EJB3 has therefore been introduced, for the same reasons mentioned above.

Regarding the other project types (CDI, JSF, etc.) no information could be found, so they have not been mentioned here. WildFly is not only a project, but also an implementation of the Java EE 7 specification. It is developed by Red Hat. You can download the latest distribution of WildFly here. There are free and paid versions for production and development.

WildFly is used to build Java EE applications. Therefore it is desirable to use JNDI, for example. The best way to learn WildFly is to create a simple web application which is based on Java EE. A development environment, for example Eclipse and Maven, is not necessary to start. The WildFly documentation is very comprehensive and also useful for Java beginners. In the following example, the application, named "eventstreaming-webapp", is built with the WildFly application server. Figure 1. Application created with WildFly As WildFly is an open source project and it could be also used in a development environment, like Eclipse, there are already several developer communities using it for Java EE development. Use cases Every enterprise application uses messaging to receive or send events. For example, 595f342e71
