New approaches to the assessment of bone mineral density: potential importance in the assessment of elderly patients. The potential importance of the use of double-energy x-ray absorptiometry as a diagnostic tool in osteoporosis is illustrated in this report with a review of the present information about the relationships of bone mineral content, bone mineral density, bone turnover and fracture. In addition, methods for measurement of bone mineral density and a few characteristics of the relationship of bone mineral density to calcium absorption are described. The conclusions which can be drawn from the information reviewed are (i) double-energy x-ray absorptiometry may have a role in the diagnosis of osteoporosis; (ii) bone mineral density appears to be closely related to bone turnover; and (iii) as the amount of bone mineral density is related to the amount of bone, a measure of "bone density" could be useful in the assessment of the risk of fracture. What is a double-blind, placebo-controlled (PBPC) study? When a new pharmaceutical agent is being tested in humans, it is generally known as a clinical trial. In a clinical trial the patients (or participants), the investigators, and the statisticians are all told what the therapy is being tested on. The patients are randomized to one or more treatment groups, and they are told which treatment they are receiving. The investigators are not told, and the statisticians are not told, what therapy they are evaluating. This is called the blinding of the treatment. Blinding is so important to the internal validity (or validity) of a clinical trial that its absence (or lack of blinding) results in a clinical trial that is not randomized (i.e., not a true clinical trial), and not double-blind. A clinical trial in which the investigators and statisticians are blinded is called a double-blind, placebo-controlled (PBPC) study. The participants (in a PBPC study) do not know what treatment they are receiving because they are receiving a placebo, and the investigators and statisticians, by virtue of blinding, do not know what treatment is being tested. This all sounds good. Yet, it is important to realize that even after the clinical trial has been started and all aspects of the trial have been finalized, there may be "last-minute" changes. If these "last-minute" changes occur, they may be so unexpected that blinding is compromised. If this happens, the "blind" is broken, and the study results cannot be
